There was the usual excitement last night and this morning, over the news of the second discovery. The high and disagreeable wind did not prevent a large representation of the business and private citizenship at the well. Every body was interested and felt fabilant, and manifested renewed faith in Blackwell's gas prospects, which had been bilighted by peculiar though excusable

The new gas well is but 3) feet west of the old well, where gas was discovered at a depth of 715 feet, according to the record that was kept at that time. It is difficult to understand why the newly discovered well should be higher than the other, and many are disposed to believe it made some mistake in recording the dis-coming from the well, just as it did from the old well at the time of the first disovery. There is little or no question now that Blackwell has paying gas, and there every indication that a greater flow will be struck further down.
